Change is coeval with Adam's fall. Who exchanged, alast for an apple his all,
Then adopted the mask—its an ancient affair—
invented at fest by the primitive pair,
To hide the deep blush of transgression,
When the juice of the fruit they ventured to sip,
Left an inefficeable stain on the lip, That made the guilty confession.

The primitive pair, with their logic and leaves, Who ins ead of contentedly binding their sheaves, Strayed after forbidden pleasure, From Eden thrust out by that act of sin, Their broad by the awent of their brows to win, ned a change severe beyond measure

Change! Change! with its thrilling chime, Ringing merily, or mouratuily toning, A restless theme, full of changing shocks, At the human breast forever knocks With its penting strokes undoes the locks, And reveals the phantom which coldly mocks At our gitter, our pains, and our meaning

Change to get and change to spare, Change to Reep, and change to share With those whose change is scarce and rare; Who sell us their wit for money,

He grinds the poor in his love of gain, And shuts his ear to the cry of pain; He knows no more of sorrow, Than the iron much When it thunders to death
The unconscious throngs that are buried by its breath, To that change which no time can borrow megalators on change, Are taking feee range,

And the greedy disciples of barters, Are improving facilitiest,
At a heavy per cent.
Devouring bonds and charters;
E'en like man in the moon changes quarters; Only to think of a man up there,
Only to think of a man up there,
With a borrowed light, and so key a stare,
In the silver line to be taking a share,
A. a tapping his horn with a blinking giare,
At the cif king, as he shakes the cold mist from his ha Harzi to the dirge of the tolling bells, The sob on the mid-day air that swells,

When the great and the prized are dying; The same cold tongue that for living worth Rolled the chant of praise through heaven and earth

Now tells the mournful story,

That the archer grim has bent his bow, And the poisoned shift of the hourly foe, With deadly might, bas isld felt low, Some far-famed son of glory. There is no disputing the obvious feet, That some men are great through infinite tact, While others are only a fizzle— A flash in the pan of the spark divine; And for those who can't bear the ambrosial wine, It is better they quietly mizzle.

I would not trench with unhallowed step,
On the ground where the dead are sleeping;
I would not rend with ruthless touch The pall a loved memory keeping.

But I think for all the grand display, The clarion's cry, and the trumpet's bray, The mulfied drum and the bugie's tone, And the cymbal's clash for a nation's groan, With badge and banner low trailing, That many a soul whom no state atter Has performed as well its stated ends, is the one whom all states are bewalling.
